Stuart:

Thank you for including me in the update on the question of autopenning of political documents. I appreciate your balanced approach, weighing the legal, political and public relations factors in the decision.

Every Admnistration has taken a similar path. None has ever requested that we machine-sign large numbers of documents occasionally or small quantities frequently. Each wished to avoid even the appearance of a political project interfering with the official business of the office. (The previous administratioin, for a while, even waited until after 5:30, after the nominal end of the business day, to autopen. However, it was found to be unsatisfactory, for we were unable to provide the support and oversight that was felt necessary.) Each has been willing to send someone to operate the machine in these instances. Each has accepted the tradition that Lee and I, as the heads of the Office, will sign a few occasionally. Over time, another acceptable approach has evolved; we will hold documents requiring a political signature until someone from the Office of Political Affairs can sign them. The ORM staff can set up the machine, explain the procedure, and let the political staffer actually operate the machine.

I talked with Doug Hoelscher this afternoon about this approach and he is quite comfortable with sending interns to perform this task. Properly instructed and supervised by ORM, we are also comfortable with this option.

Unless you see some problems with this arrangement. I will pursue this with Doug.
