THOMAS M. HARDIMAN
Candidate for the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit

Age: 40  Residence: Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

Education:
Georgetown University Law Center, J.D. cum laude, 1990.

Legal and Professional Experience:
Partner, Reed Smith LLP, 1999-2003.
Associate, 1992-1996.

Professional and Civic Activities:
Member, Governor's Judicial Advisory Commission, Fifth Judicial District, 2000-2003.
Hearing Officer, Disciplinary Board of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, 1995-1999.

Judicial Philosophy:
With respect to the role of the judiciary, Hardiman believes in “legislative supremacy,” which he explains as follows: Because the “people speak through their elected representatives in Congress,” judges are called upon to construe statutes in a way they may not agree with. When interpreting a statutory provision, Hardiman reads the plain text, and if it is clear, he stops. If there is an ambiguity, he considers the location of the provision within the statute as a whole, the surrounding provisions, and, “as a last resort,” the legislative history. If called upon to address a Constitutional question, he would consider the language of the Constitution and any pertinent Supreme Court precedents. The judges he admires most are Justice Alito, former Third Circuit Judge Chertoff, and Third Circuit Judge Brooks Smith.

Confirmation Considerations:
Hardiman was strongly recommended by Senator Santorum.

JUDICIAL PHILOSOPHY:
Holmes indicated that the act of interpreting a statute should begin with the words of the statute. Only if the language is ambiguous should one “venture into legislative history,” and then “only with great caution.” With constitutional cases, he would look to the text of the Constitution and to the Federalist Papers. He admires Justice Scalia for his intellectual rigor and adherence to the proper role of a judge. On a more personal level, he admires Justice Thomas for his willingness to buck expectations.

CONFIRMATION CONSIDERATIONS:
Holmes has significant civil and criminal experience. He was recommended by Senator Inhofe and had both Senators’ support for the district court vacancy for which he was nominated.

Judicial Philosophy:
Fischer would approach judging the same way she approaches the law when providing advice to her clients: she first understands the facts and then hits the books to see what the statutes and cases say. In matters of statutory construction, she would first consider the wording of the statute. If there is an ambiguity, she would turn to the canons of statutory construction, any legislative history, and precedents interpreting parallel statutes. If a statute’s best reading would lead to a silly result, Fischer would “use some common sense” and “look at what the ultimate outcome would be.” Fischer considers herself “a conservative person” who is “not looking to make waves or to expand the base of the law.” She also describes herself as a “strict constructionist,” which means she “looks at what the law and rules are and follows them.” She finds “no need to go into the shadows and asides of judicial precedents,” and instead figures out what a case’s holding is and applies it. The judges she admires most are those who are even-tempered, efficient, and bright and who know how to move their dockets.

Confirmation Considerations:
Fischer is supported by Senators Specter and Santorum.

Judicial Philosophy:
Bailey believes that a judge’s role is to resolve specific disputes and to act as an umpire, to borrow an analogy from Chief Justice Roberts, not to act “as social engineers.” He views himself as a “conservative” who would be unlike “liberal” judges who reach out to find a cause of action for a plaintiff when one has not been pled, or fail to perform a proper gatekeeping function in the courtroom.
In matters of statutory construction, Bailey would apply the text as written and check the legislative history only if there is an ambiguity. He believes that foreign law has “limited if any relevance” to the interpretation of the laws and Constitution of the United States. Bailey would assume that Congressional enactments are constitutional and proceed with great caution before considering striking down a statute as unconstitutional.

Confirmation Considerations:
Bailey is recommended by Rep. Shelley Moore Capito.
